This Spring, Get a Convertible
Karey Kyle's Spring '06 Collection Features "Convertible" Jewelry

NEW YORK (April 3, 2006) – When is a necklace not just a necklace? When it's designed by Karey Kyle.

In her quest to design accessories that break convention, Karey's 2006 spring collection features two delightful pieces that are anything but run of the mill.

The first is the Metropolitan necklace. With a sterling silver chain and rings, this eye-catching piece comes in two styles. One features turquoise and ruby stones, while the other boasts aquamarine and amethyst accents. By unhooking specific sections of the necklace, the Metropolitan transforms from a long necklace into a set of earrings, two short necklaces and/or a chunky bracelet, elevating the term "versatile accessory," to new heights.

The second piece is the liquid cool Vodkatini necklace. Round sterling silver tags and a sterling silver chain make up this piece. Two chains cascade along the back for a sexy look with strapless or backless fashions, while the front chain is its own attractive necklace. The chains can also be folded into a traditional necklace for a sophisticated, everyday look.

"Many think of jewelry as something static, but for me it's a true form of expression and an avenue of creativity," says Karey. "Designing pieces such as the Metropolitan and Vodkatini is a natural evolution, and I love the fact because they are so versatile each person can add their own flair and make the piece truly their own."

You can view Karey's spring 2006 line at www.kareykyle.com. In addition to her convertible necklaces, the line includes the dramatic Dirty Martini earrings, which combine a single chalcedony stone surrounded by delicate moonstones and sterling silver hooks, and the Raspberry Bellini necklace, with a sterling silver chain and dazzling pink zircon gem.
